

Accessory racks and cable management racks

Article Overview

Effective cable management in accessory racks combines horizontal and vertical routing, strain relief, labeling, and protective accessories to optimize airflow, reduce signal interference, and simplify maintenance.

Horizontal and Vertical Cable Management

Horizontal cable managers are installed between devices in a rack to organize patch cords, maintain proper bend radii, and provide local tidiness. They often include troughs, finger ducts, or lacing bars to guide cables from patch panels to switches while preventing kinks and stress on connectors. Vertical cable managers run along the sides or rear of racks, serving as backbone channels for large bundles of copper or fiber cables. They help distribute cables between rack units, prevent sagging, and reduce strain on terminations. Vertical managers often feature D-rings, hooks, or channels for secure routing. A common layout is the “sandwich” method: Patch Panel → 1U Horizontal Cable Manager → Switch, which ensures neat routing and proper airflow.

Cable Securing and Protection

Cable ties (nylon, stainless steel, reusable, or color-coded) are essential for bundling and securing cables, reducing tangling, and preventing excessive pulling stress. Cable lacing bars or strain relief bars provide horizontal support and relieve stress on patch cables connected to devices, serving as cost-effective alternatives to horizont...
