

Source of the small busbar at the top of the screen

Article Overview

The small busbar at the top of a screen is typically a solid copper rod, about 6mm in diameter, installed on substation protection cabinets for voltage and power circuit connections.

Description and Function

The small busbar is a secondary conductive bar mounted on the top of a substation protection screen cabinet. It is generally made of solid copper and fixed using a special base designed for secure attachment. Its primary purpose is to provide interconnections between protection screens, including voltage circuits and AC/DC power supply circuits, ensuring reliable electrical continuity and system safety (CN116191151A) .

Connection and Installation

- The busbar is usually installed through a dedicated fixing base that holds it firmly on the cabinet top.
- Connections between busbars or to other devices are made using cross-boundary wires, which can be customized in length. The ends of these wires are inserted directly into the busbar terminals, allowing quick insertion and secure contact without altering existing wiring.
- This design minimizes the risk of short circuits, grounding faults, or protection device malfunctions during maintenance or equipment upgrades (CN116191151A)
